

Gameplay

The game is simple to set up. Everybody gets 3 Head cards and 3 Body cards, then one person takes the first turn as the Sexy Single. Whoever is the Sexy Single draws 3 Interest cards and reads allowed in their best dating show contestant voice that they are looking for someone to meet these specific interests. From there, the players have to combine a Head and Body card to make the perfect date that fits those specific interests.

Once every player has played either date, they take turns selling their date to the Sexy Single by explaining in their best “I no longer want to be single” voice how they are the perfect fit for the Sexy Single. Once everybody has had a chance to “woo” the Sexy Single, they then pick the player that best fit their interests and give them only the interest cards that fit them.

By the rules, you would discard all Head and Body cards, as well as the interest cards the winning date didn’t get. However, it was also fun to play with the idea that even the losing dates could earn a few points and win the interest card that the winning date failed to win. For instance, if the Sexy Single was looking for someone to look after their kids, get them free stuff, and want to live in a zoo some day (yes, these are real cards in the game), but Player 1 won by meeting the first two interests, then Player 3 could have won the third interest card by meeting the “live in a zoo someday” interest that Player 1 didn’t meet.

The player to get 5 interest cards, with at least one in each of the three categories, is the winner! Again, you can always increase that number if you want to keep the game rolling. I found with 3 players, 10 cards is a good goal for a short game session.
